Such objection would apply to any board or commission that has authority for the betterment of conditions. "The demand in Connecticut is growing each year and legislation is inevitable at some time. Experience has shown that the longer the delay the more difficult becomes the solu-tion and the more drastic legislation. It would be less difficult and less ex-pensive to prevent further contamination of the rivers, if done at once, than to let the increasing contamination go on a few years, when it would be very difficult and very expensive to bring them back to even the present condition of purity. The public demand is increasing and the quicker it is recognized the less will be the trouble laid up for the future.

It will en-able the state board to assist the communities that are trying to solve this problem, not to harm them, and at he same time to prevent further pollution, and to look toward an improve ment of present conditions as fast as a feasible. In many states where such power has been given to the board of health, it has always been found that it is used wisely and there is no reason for believing that it would be otherwise in our state."
